

5 habits behind local- government posts that actually travel.

Drawn from 1,000,000+ posts across 5,000+ U.S.
city & county pages.

swipe →

1

Name a real person

Not "our staff." The actual name. Posts that thank or name a specific employee pull ~125% more engagement than the generic version.

Okanogan County, WA — a 31-year retirement: 1,600 reactions.

2

Lead with faces, not flyers

A photo of real people beats a graphic-of-text every time — by 70%+ across every topic we measure

Hallowell, ME (pop. 2,500) thanking its volunteers: 436 reactions.

3

Make it a local moment

Bears downtown. Ducklings rescued from a storm drain. The win isn't the topic — it's a specific moment residents recognize as theirs.

Hendersonville, NC — painted "Bearfootin'" bears: 1,300 reactions.

4

Skip the press-release voice

"We are pleased to announce" gets scrolled past. Genuine celebration language lifts engagement ~65%. Write like a neighbor, not a memo.

5

Post it when it's timely

Our single best-reaching post all spring was a Memorial Day benchmark — it out-reached everything else ~4x. Tie real moments to the calendar.

YOUR TURN

Want to see which of these your city already nails — and which it's leaving on the table?

We'll build you a free one-page benchmark for your own city or county: how your engagement compares to peers, plus the patterns worth lifting from your own post history.

Free report — link in the comments ↓